Starting to teach Philosophy for Children requires some initial 'know how' that you can gain from suitable training. What then? You are likely to need resources, lesson plans and curriculum models or 'pathways'. You will also need a steady supply of stimulating activities to help pupils acquire enquiry skills and collaborative dispositions. You may also need advice and recommendations from experienced teachers of p4c in your subject area or key stage.

All this and more will be available from p4c.com, the first subscription-based online resource and collaboration service for p4c. It will have contributions from teachers, philosophers and other p4c educators from around the world.

Through p4c.com, we aim to provide an indispensable service for teachers who want pupils to think for themselves through philosophical dialogue with others. It will be launched when 1,000 people agree to subscribe. In the meantime the site is being constructed with new additions every day.

Our first 1,000 subscribers will receive a 20% discount at launch time and will have the option of being honoured on a webpage for the life of the service to mark their contribution to making it possible. We hope you will join us.
